Acknowledgements

The compilers are indebted to a great many people for their advice and assistance. In the first place, the project would not have come into being at all without the support and encouragement of the late Christopher Thoron, who was President of the American University in Cairo from 1969 until his untimely death in 1974. Among other officers or former officers of the American University in Cairo who did much to facilitate work, particularly in times of difficulty, were Dr Richard Crabbs, Dr Hussein Fawzy, Dr Mohammed Allam, Dr Cecil Byrd, Dr Thomas Lamont, Mr Peter Nichols, Dr Richard Pedersen, Dr Moyer Hunsberger, Dr Marsden Jones, Mr Ahmed El-Lozy, Mr Carl Schieren and Miss Priscilla Blakemore.

The project enjoyed the support of several institutions. A major part of the funding was provided by the U.S. Office of Education, among whose officers Mrs Julia Petrov, who was our understanding and long-suffering Program Officer, and Dr Richard Thompson deserve special thanks for their help. Substantial support was also provided by the Ford Foundation, in which connection acknowledgement is due to Mr William Irelan, Dr Ronald Wolfe, Mr Courtney Nelson, Mr Samuel Bunker, Dr Björn Jernudd and Professor Richard Tucker. The moral support of the Arabic Language Academy in Cairo was indispensable, and for this we owe thanks in particular to Dr Ibrahim Madkour, formerly Secretary and now Chairman of the Academy, for his encouragement and advice (although the content of the dictionary is of course the responsibility of the compilers alone), and to Mr Ibrahim El-Tarzi.

The basic work of preparation of this dictionary took place between the years 1972-1977. Two experts whose help was indispensable during this period were Dr Raymond Bathurst, who handled the technical and computing side of the operation, and Dr Karl Stowasser, who initiated us into the elusive art of lexicography and readily shared with us the labour of drafting and redrafting some of the most complex entries. We were also fortunate enough to have the benefit of informed comments and criticisms from Professor T.F. Mitchell and Mr David Cowan. Work on the "production line" included labours of herculean proportions, particularly on the part of our principal assistants Dr Humphrey Davies and Mrs Carol Bebawi, while special mention needs to be made too of the contribution of Dr Elizabeth Sartain (notably her work in the area of etymologies), Dr Kristina Nelson, Mr Mohammed El-Saati, Mr Maged El-Kommos and Mr Jeffrey Bennett; the illustrations are the work of Mrs Elizabeth Rodenbeck. To these and to the very many others — too numerous to name — who gave of themselves unstintingly in this work, we extend our thanks.

Introduction

This dictionary is intended to satisfy a longstanding need on the part of speakers of English for a dictionary with which to comprehend Egyptian Arabic. During the past twenty-five years progress has been made in the lexicography of Arabic dialects other than Egyptian, principally as a result of efforts based at Georgetown University; and the study of literary Arabic was transformed for speakers of English by the appearance in 1961 of Hans Wehr's A dictionary of modern written Arabic. Such developments have highlighted the need for documentation of the dominant regional form of Arabic. For Egyptian Arabic is not only the native tongue of over forty-five million people who constitute just under one third of the Arabic-speaking world; it is also — because of Egypt's important cultural and political role as an Arab state — the most widely understood form of regional Arabic.

The language described here is essentially spoken language and, as such, it may be contrasted with formal written language. In this connection, it may first be remarked that the prevalence of the view that literary Arabic (al-lughā al-fuṣḥā) should replace its “corrupt” variant, the popular language (al-lughā al-‘āmmiyya), as the normal vehicle of spontaneous spoken communication cannot be allowed to obscure the fact that this is not the case in Egypt at present and there are no grounds for anticipating any major change in this respect. Moreover, the associated notion that only al-fuṣḥā can be credited with a “real” existence as a “proper” system of language (to the exclusion of the ‘āmmiyya of the uneducated) fails to explain how educated and uneducated Egyptians alike — all of whom communicate with each other in the course of their daily round by means of ‘āmmiyya of one sort or another — contrive to achieve some measure of mutual intelligibility. This dictionary is accordingly based on an alternative view of language variation in Egypt, a view which sees the ‘āmmiyya of illiterate people as no less a system of language than is the inherited classical fuṣḥā and — in the absence of any clear picture of historical evolution — envisages a synchronic language scheme in which these two systems are at extremes from one another, while between them lie three other distinguishable systems. Each of these five systems, or levels, contains elements which exist also in one or more of the other levels, but in varying proportions; although the divisions between the levels are of course blurred rather than clear-cut, each level can nonetheless be typified by its own specific combination of linguistic and allied social, educational and psychological characteristics.

This scheme<sup>1</sup> distinguishes two levels of fuṣḥā and three levels of ‘āmmiyya. The older of the two levels of fuṣḥā, which may be termed fuṣḥā al-turāth, is specifically the linguistic vehicle of the legacy of Islamic high culture and religion, while contemporary fuṣḥā, which may be termed fuṣḥā al-‘aṣr, is the vehicle of modern culture and technology. In Egypt, fuṣḥā al-turāth varies only minimally from the classical descriptions of fuṣḥā, as might be expected in what is now in effect a liturgical language. Fuṣḥā al-‘aṣr, on the other hand, as the vehicle of today's intellectual needs, exhibits features which contrast with the usual classical conventions — notably a marked preference for nominal, rather than verbal, sentences; moreover, when employed orally in Egypt, fuṣḥā al-‘aṣr displays other departures (phonological, morphological and syntactic) from the norms of fuṣḥā al-turāth, and these departures for the most part occur in more pronounced forms in the various levels of ‘āmmiyya. This dictionary is not concerned with lexical items which are restricted to one or both of these levels of fuṣḥā, on the ground that they are common to Egypt and other parts of the Arabic-writing world and are (or should be) documented elsewhere.

Three levels of ‘āmmiyya can usefully be distinguished and it is with these that this dictionary is concerned. The mother tongue of any given Egyptian child is one of only two of these, the principal distinction here being whether the family background of the child is characterized by literacy or illiteracy. By the time a child reaches school age, he will have acquired a type of mother tongue which can be broadly classified as the ‘āmmiyya either of the “enlightened” (al-mutanawwirin) or of the illiterate (al-ummiyyin), the latter being predominant. If the child then goes to school, he is made to function not on his own linguistic level but on the level of fuṣḥā al-‘aṣr (in secular schools) or of fuṣḥā al-turāth (within the Azhar system). It is here, in respect of the individual — rather than in the broader frame of the totality of Egyptian language variation — that the phenomenon termed diglossia can usefully be recognized and studied, for from this time the child advances (or fails to advance, as the case may be) simultaneously on two separate language levels, advance in one being linked with advance in the other. What may be regarded as a fruitful culmination of this process — in the form of mastery of the third, acquired, level of ‘āmmiyya, namely that of the highly educated (al-muthaqqafin) — is restricted to a small percentage of the population. This level of ‘āmmiyya is in effect the spoken counterpart of the written fuṣḥā al-‘aṣr and is used only in appropriate contexts of interaction between muthaqqafin or would-be muthaqqafin; their language in more mundane contexts is ordinarily ‘āmmiyyat al-mutanawwirin, although some may also initially have been speakers of ‘āmmiyyat al-ummiyyin.

A few examples of linguistic distinctions between these three broad levels of ‘āmmiyya may be useful here. ‘Āmmiyyat al-muthaqqafin, being the ‘āmmiyya most strongly influenced by al-fuṣḥā, is characterized phonologically by a measure of flexibility in respect of both consonants and vowels: although the ث, the ð and the ط are usually rendered as s, z and z respectively, they are sometimes given the phonetic values of fuṣḥā, and the ق frequently occurs as q; the fuṣḥā diphthongs aw and ay also occur, albeit less commonly than oo and ee; and fuṣḥā long vowels are sometimes preserved in unstressed positions. In the phonology of ‘āmmiyyat al-mutanawwirin, however, the element associable with fuṣḥā is smaller: the ث, the ð and the ط are commonly rendered as t, d and d, and less commonly as s, z and z, while the ق only infrequently occurs as q; the diphthongs aw and ay normally disappear, as do fuṣḥā long vowels which fall outside the Egyptian system of word stress. In the phonology of ‘āmmiyyat al-ummiyyin, the ث, the ð and the ط are rendered as t, d and d with very few exceptions, and the ق as q is rare (e.g. muqri, qur’ān).

As far as morphology and syntax are concerned, passive forms are fairly common in ‘āmmiyyat al-muthaqqafin, are much less common in ‘āmmiyyat al-mutanawwirin, and are almost entirely absent in ‘āmmiyyat al-ummiyyin; the residual occurrences of the i’rāb of fuṣḥā and of fuṣḥā negation systems to be found in ‘āmmiyyat al-muthaqqafin are not to be found in the two other levels of ‘āmmiyya; the use of verbal nouns and the occurrence of verbal sentences are far more common in ‘āmmiyyat al-muthaqqafin than in the two other levels; with these two other levels comes greater use of constructions involving biṭā’ and fī(h), as well as an additional system of enumeration in contexts of ordering and itemizing; finally, ‘āmmiyyat al-ummiyyin is characterized in particular by its partiality for formulaic expressions and clichés.

The total scheme of language variation and interaction in Egypt can be represented in diagrammatical form thus:

In this diagram, the line a-b represents what is theoretically the highest level of “correctness” in the literary language, i.e. what is widely esteemed as the pure fuṣḥā described by classical grammarians and lexicographers. The line c-d, on the other hand, represents what is theoretically the least educated type of 'āmīyya, i.e. the form of language which exhibits the greatest number of linguistic differences from fuṣḥā and enjoys little or no esteem within the community. Lines a-f and b-f represent the erosion of features attributed to the line a-b; in other words, they represent the proportional distribution of fuṣḥā features within the various levels. Conversely, lines c-e and d-e represent the erosion of features attributed to the line c-d; in other words, they represent the proportional distribution of 'āmīyya features within the various levels. The area e-g-f-h accordingly represents the overlap of the literary and colloquial languages, while the areas a-g-e and e-h-b represent "pure" fuṣḥā features and the areas c-g-f and f-h-d represent "pure" 'āmīyya features. The areas a-g-c and b-h-d represent the proportional distribution of foreign (dakhlī) influence within the five levels.

In connection with foreign borrowings it should first be stressed that what may be foreign to the Arabic component of Egyptian Arabic is not necessarily foreign to Egypt. Arabic was, after all, a language at one time foreign to Egyptians, and the labelling of ancient but surviving Coptic and Greek elements as "foreign" is intended to signify their foreignness to Arabic rather than to Egypt. The identification of existing lexical items with ancient Coptic forms is, moreover, fraught with difficulty (more is said about this below) and there is often no way of knowing whether an identifiably Greek form first gained some currency in Egypt before the Arab conquest (effectively completed in 641 AD) or after it. All that can usefully be said here in this regard is that there seems to have been a fusion from the seventh century onwards of one or more kinds of Arabic with certain pre-existing elements in Egypt, together with the super-addition of further foreign borrowings. The Arabic character of the language is pervasive, to the extent perhaps of having recast in an Arabic mould some of what was absorbed from the indigenous linguistic environment, for example in the vocabulary of riparian agrarian life, which was alien to the Arab cultural heritage. Such recasting is evident in the clustering of semantically related forms around verb roots which seem unlikely to have their origin in Arabic; on the other hand, there are also instances where such verb-root evolution has not taken place, and in this respect Egyptian Arabic can be contrasted with Syrian Arabic, which is more productive of verb roots in such circumstances. In general terms, then, Egyptian Arabic can be regarded as consisting of two main lexical categories, each of which can be subdivided: 1. Arabic: a) items which coincide nearly or completely with counterparts existing in literary Arabic, and b) items which have recognizable counterparts in literary Arabic, while yet differing from them in some significant and specifically Egyptian fashion. 2. Non-Arabic: a) items apparently specific to Egypt and without Arabic counterparts, and not identifiable as relatively modern foreign borrowings, and b) items identifiable as relatively modern borrowings.

The levels which contain the smallest proportions of non-Arabic items are fuṣḥā al-turāth and 'āmīyyat al-ummiyyīn, the former because of its static and frozen character and the latter because illiteracy has the effect of insulating its speakers from the direct influence of modern culture and the outside world. In 'āmīyyat al-ummiyyīn, the majority of non-Arabic items are old or fairly old residents in the language (Coptic, Persian and Turkish, together with some Greek, Italian, French and English), mostly in such areas as agriculture, food, the household and administration; normally, only major and dramatic events, such as war, can account for the admission of new borrowings at that level (e.g., nabalm). A greater number of non-Arabic items is to be found both in fuṣḥā al-ʿaṣr and in 'āmīyyat al-mutanawwīrīn, although of differing types. The items in fuṣḥā al-ʿaṣr for the most part belong to the vocabulary of modern culture and technology and have either achieved recognition from the Arabic Language Academy or have simply acquired currency by the legitimizing force of written usage. Non-Arabic items in 'āmīyyat al-mutanawwīrīn, on the other hand, relate for the most part to areas such as fashion, imported cosmetics, modern household appliances etc., which are beyond the financial reach and — often — the inherited tastes of speakers of 'āmīyyat al-ummiyyīn; thus, while many of the non-Arabic items occurring in 'āmīyyat al-ummiyyīn occur also in 'āmīyyat al-mutanawwīrīn, the converse does not hold true. Finally, it can be noted that it is 'āmīyyat al-muthaqqafīn that contains the greatest number of non-Arabic items: this is because it makes use of items to be found in all the other levels, because its speakers are most directly in contact with influences from outside, and because they are not as restrained in speech as they are in writing. Indeed, nearly all newly borrowed items make their entrance into Egypt by way of this level and from this point may move also into fuṣḥā al-ʿaṣr (e.g., siryāli) or into 'āmīyyat al-mutanawwīrīn (e.g., ṣil-ṣaylaynar), although some items do not move further and may die out naturally (e.g., ṣin-noohaaw).

It is the purpose of this dictionary to document stable lexical items occurring in any one or more of the three levels of ‘āmmiyya defined above. Lexical items or forms restricted to ‘āmmiyyat al-ummiyyin are marked with an arrow pointing downwards and items or forms restricted to ‘āmmiyyat al-muthaqqafin (other than items which are self-evidently restricted to that level) are marked with an arrow pointing upwards. Although the designation “Egyptian Arabic” has been employed, the focus is on Cairo and the phonological frame is that of Cairo and the Delta, to the exclusion of Upper Egypt where the phonology is markedly different; Alexandria, too, has been denied the closer attention that it clearly deserves. Rural items given here belong to the rural scene in the vicinity of Cairo and in the Delta, although the seemingly endless range of local variants there has by no means been covered exhaustively. Other items may be assumed to be current in Cairo unless otherwise indicated.

The entries have been drafted with the primary purpose of fulfilling the needs of an English-speaking user who requires a general, overall-descriptive, synchronic, comprehension dictionary of Egyptian Arabic at all levels of society. As an overall-descriptive synchronic dictionary, it is intended to describe the language as it is now, rather than as it was, as it may be in the future, or as some would like it to be. Particular importance has been attached to the provision of numerous examples, both transparent in meaning and non-transparent. One departure from normal practice in bilingual synchronic lexicography of modern languages is, however, a modest attempt to provide some information of an etymological character; more is said about this below, but it may be stressed here that the compilers are well aware of the limitations of the present 2000-item etymological contribution. As for highly specialized terminology, and compound terms in particular, the question of what to include and what to leave out across the various subject areas has been no less problematical here than in the compilation of any overall-descriptive dictionary. Special attention has been paid to termini technici in traditional areas of activity, which are fairly stable in the language but for the most part less well documented than the termini technici of modern science and technology; but it is clear that much subject-related work is needed to a greater depth than has been possible here if a large part of the highly specialized vocabulary of traditional Egyptian handicrafts is not to pass into oblivion. The main geographical names have been included, both inside and outside Egypt; personal names have been included only in special cases, notably where idiomatic expressions are involved. For a succinct description of the grammar of Egyptian Arabic, the user is referred to T.F. Mitchell, An introduction to Egyptian colloquial Arabic (London, Oxford University Press, 1956, repr. 1978); mention may here be made also of T.F. Mitchell, Colloquial Arabic: the living language of Egypt (London, English Universities Press, 1962) and Ernest T. Abdel-Massih, An introduction to Egyptian Arabic (Ann Arbor, The University of Michigan, 1975).

Although there can be no doubt that this work suffers from shortcomings of a kind inevitable in a pioneering work, in this case exacerbated by a dearth of relevant linguistic studies, the status of pioneer in the field must in truth be accorded to Socrates Spiro, whose Egyptian Arabic-English dictionary first appeared in 1895 under the title An Arabic-English vocabulary of the colloquial Arabic of Egypt containing the vernacular items and expressions, slang phrases, vocables etc. used by native Egyptians, and in revised form in 1923 under the title An Arabic-English dictionary of the modern Arabic of Egypt. Spiro’s work gives about 12,500 fairly detailed entries, attempts to identify borrowings from other languages, and provides some contextual illustrations, but despite its merits it is now of value only for its intrinsic historical interest and is, understandably enough, inadequate and misleading as a guide to Egyptian Arabic of the present day. Many terms given by Spiro (particularly those of Turkish origin) have since become obsolete, others have changed in sense or form, and numerous new lexical items and expressions have gained acceptance since his time, whether by borrowing from other languages or by internal derivation for purposes of new or substantially overhauled institutional, technological and ideological terminology. Accordingly, no reliance was placed on Spiro during the compilation of this dictionary, although a check at the final stage did yield some items which would otherwise have been missed.

A fundamental feature of the present work is that it has been undertaken as a dictionary of a “vacuum” type, based on field work and raw data without reference to any previous dictionary (apart from the final check of Spiro just mentioned). This is not to say that relevant published work was ignored, but attestations were not accepted merely on the authority of the printed word, and the overwhelming bulk of the data was oral and transcribed from tape-recordings. Several million words of material were edited down to a corpus of 400,000 words covering all aspects of Egyptian life, mostly in context strings, and were encoded with accompanying lexical analysis in machine-readable form so that they could be processed by computer in a way which yielded an ordered distillation of all encoded material and analysis. The drafting was based on this distillation and resulted in the present text of over 22,500 headword entries. This figure may be compared with the 35,000 headword entries of Wehr (third edition) in a text of about the same length and with the 14,000 headword entries in a text of about half the length to be found in A dictionary of Iraqi Arabic: Arabic-English compiled by Woodhead and Beene (Georgetown 1967). The relatively greater length of the average headword entry in the present work can be attributed mainly to the quantity of illustrative examples included in many of the 30,000 sense divisions, among them over 6,500 idiomatic and non-transparent usages.

Arrangement of Entries

1. Roots

The Arabic rooting system is employed, with modifications appropriate to the arrangement of Egyptian Arabic. Roots containing verbs are normally treated as they would be in the lexicography of literary Arabic, except that roots including radicals associated with the literary ث and د are given in their Egyptian forms, with cross-references from the literary form of the root; thus the headword ladʿa appears under the root ل د ع and there is a cross-reference to that root from the literary root ل د ع. The rooting of items containing the glottal stop associated with Arabic ق preserves that ق, however, since the uvular rendering of ق coexists in the language with the glottal rendering, while the ث and ذ (with one exception of little importance) in effect represent phonemes which do not exist in Egyptian Arabic.

In cases where two or more Egyptian variants of a literary Arabic root exist, these are sometimes brought together and sometimes kept separate — always with cross-references — according to semantic criteria. Thus ز ك ر and د ك ر are kept apart as separate roots, both cross-referenced from ر ك ز; on the other hand, there is every reason for keeping together all the items associated with a literary root such as ث ل ث and on such occasions the dominant Egyptian root has been used for grouping purposes, so that the root ت ل ت heads all relevant entries, both tilt, talat etc. and sulus, sulaasi etc.; there is a simple cross-reference to ت ل ت from the literary root ث ل ث, and another cross-reference from the minor sibling Egyptian root س ل س with a listing of the relevant headwords to be found under ت ل ت, viz. sulus, sulaasi etc.

Identical roots containing groups of lexical scatter semantically distinct from each other have been separated and numbered off. However, where two or more items with identical radicals exist as isolated forms, these have been given under a single root, such a root being within parentheses. The rooting of items which cannot readily be associated with verbs has been carried out by reference to the headword in its transcribed form, e.g., ي د د for yadd. Non-verbal Egyptian forms and foreign borrowings which cannot be regarded as having a place in fushā al-turāth take long vowels into account e.g., ع ش ا ن for ʿaṣān and ص ل و ن for ṣaloon; final short vowels are sometimes regarded as long for this purpose in any position up to the fourth radical, e.g., ا ش ا for baaʿa and س ن م ا for sinima. Where it appears from lexical scatter that some assimilation can be regarded as having taken place in a headword, this has been taken into account in the selection of the radicals, e.g., the root ب و ب for the headword ʿambuuba /n pl ʿanabiib/. Where, however, an item has an exact counterpart long resident in classical Arabic, the literary root form has been accorded to it even when a verb form is lacking, e.g., the root خ ر ف for the headword xaruuf. Basically, the user who refers to literary root forms should have no difficulty in finding the right place, albeit by means of cross-references. Two final points may be mentioned here: where the root exceeds five radicals, the first four are given followed by a dash; and the ordering of roots takes gemination into account, instead of placing geminate roots at the head of a series, e.g. ش د خ follows ش د د instead of preceding it.

2. Headwords

All headwords are given in two forms, viz. a form in Arabic script and a phonetic representation given in italic transcription. The forms given in Arabic script are intended to serve as a guide to the common written form, subject to the limitation that Egyptian Arabic is still essentially a spoken language without firm orthographic conventions. The following points may be noted in connection with headwords:

- i) The ordering of headwords within a root entry is according to the principle of first giving the simple verb and forms directly associated with it, followed by non-verbal forms grouped and ordered according to length, and finally derived verbs and forms associated with them.

ii) The symbols used in conjunction with transcribed headwords are:

a) ↑ : restricted to 'āmīyyat al-muthaqqafīn

b) ↓ : restricted to 'āmīyyat al-umīyyīn

c) colon: current in (following phrases)

d) small elevated numeral: one of two or more homophones.

iii) Variant headwords of roughly equal currency are dealt with in the following ways:

a) Many entries that are short are repeated, e.g.:

لارنج laring /coll n/ Seville oranges. — also naring.

نارنج naring /coll n/ Seville oranges. — also laring.

b) In the case of the coexistence of assimilated and unassimilated forms taken to be of roughly equal currency, these are given as follows: اسبب sīsabbī or fīsabbī . . . The verbal information run-on (see below) of such an entry gives only unassimilated forms, but this should not be taken to mean that assimilated forms are any less common.

iv) Variant headwords of unequal currency

Where phonetic variations are such that they lie within the frame of the Arabic-script headword, they are given in an order of priority which is intended to reflect notions of their relative currency, e.g., ترکواز turkuwaaz, tirkuwaaz, turukwaaz, tirikwaaz . . . Less current variants which do not lie within the frame of the Arabic-script headword are given in parentheses in the entry of the more current form and cross-referenced from their own root, e.g., under the root ع ش ا ʿṣā, the entry reads عشان aṣaʿ (also ḡalaṣaʿ) . . . and there is a cross-reference to the latter form from the root entry ع ل ش ʿlṣ. Parentheses are also used when a headword may be used in conjunction with another word with no change of meaning, e.g., zabaadi (also laban zabaadi); in such cases no implication of relative currency is intended.

3. Verbal information and run-on entries

Entries dealing with verbs normally terminate with a listing of the verbal noun(s) and verbal adjectives or participles associated with that verb in Egyptian Arabic; the forms given are sometimes incongruous from the standpoint of literary Arabic. These items of verbal information do not thereafter qualify for treatment as separate entries unless they occur in set phrases requiring definition away from the verb entry or have nominal or adjectival functions in addition to their verbal functions. In a spirit of compromise, the term “inactive verbal adjective” (iva) has been employed in order to avoid the need to describe the participles of intrinsically passive derived forms of the verb as either active or passive — this being a moot point among exponents of Arabic grammar.

Idiomatic and phrasal run-on entries start on a new line preceded by ¶. Material is allocated to a run-on entry when it is in some way distinct from the main entry that it follows while yet being too closely linked with it in form to merit an independent entry. The most common examples of such material are verb-plus-preposition as a lexical unit, conjunctive phrases formed from preposition-plus-ma, and adverbial forms such as ḡaadatan and ḡumūuman.

4. Etymologies

With regard to material of an etymological character in this dictionary, more could have been done if a very great deal more time had been available for the task. In practice, however, the priorities of the documentation of Egyptian Arabic dictated adherence to modest goals in this complex area, by concentrating in the first place on pulling together the fairly exiguous relevant work available and then by adding such further points as became apparent. Entanglement in the toils of Semitic philology has not seemed appropriate, so that loanwords which have for long been resident in Arabic generally have only rarely been accorded etymons in Hebrew, Syriac etc. The focus has been rather on items borrowed specifically by Egypt and on loanwords more general in the various regional forms of Arabic but of recent arrival, and the main languages involved are therefore Coptic, Greek, Turkish, Italian, French and English. Two general works consulted in this connection were Rufāʿil Nakhla al-Yasūʿī, Ḡharāʾib al-lahja al-miṣriyya (Beirut, 1964) and Aḥmad ʿĪsā, al-Muḥkam fī uṣūl al-kalimāi al-ʿammiyya (Cairo, 1938).<sup>1</sup>

The task of dealing with survivals from Coptic is accompanied by particular complications, not only because of the antiquity of that language and the shortage of published studies on its relation with Egyptian Arabic but also because Coptic terms varied in the different Coptic dialects and there are in any case difficulties in knowing how they were pronounced. For these reasons, and because too some of the likely etymons are recorded only in hieroglyphs, Coptic/Egyptian etymons have not been given. The identification <Copt>, it should be noted, includes those items attested only in hieroglyphs. In addition to Nakhla's book mentioned above, the following works have been consulted in this connection: Wilson B. Bishai, "The Coptic influence on Egyptian Arabic" (Johns Hopkins University Ph.D. dissertation, Baltimore, 1959); ibid. "Coptic lexical influence on Egyptian Arabic", Journal of Near Eastern Studies 23 (1964), pp.39-47; W.E. Crum, A Coptic dictionary (Oxford, 1939); George Sobhy, Common words in the spoken Arabic of Egypt, of Greek and Coptic origin (Cairo, 1950); and Wilyam Naẓīr, al-Ādāt al-miṣriyya bayna 'l-ams wa-'l-yawm (Cairo, 1967).

As might be expected, there has in some cases been considerable difficulty in deciding whether a loanword was borrowed directly from its putative language of origin or came via another language. This is particularly so with items of Persian origin, some of which seem likely to have come via Turkish, others via Arabic and yet others directly. The same problem arises with a number of Greek and Italian terms, which may have arrived either directly or via Turkish. In general, an etymon is given in its form in the language of origin, unless some change in the pronunciation or meaning suggests a route via Turkish; in this latter case, the Turkish etymon is given, accompanied by a note "from P", "from It" etc. to indicate that the item is not Turkish by origin. In the case of items that can be traced to terms common to two or more European languages, attempts have been made on the basis of pronunciation and any other available clues to specify the probable source language. Items of general European origin have been left without etymological information.

Etymological information is given between angle brackets and the following abbreviations are used: Copt(ic), Engl(ish), Fr(ench), Gr(eek), It(alian), P(ersian), Sp(anish), Syr(iac), T(urkish). In cases of decided uncertainty, information is given with the qualifications "perh", "poss", or "prob". For reasons already indicated, Coptic, Syriac and Hebrew etymons are omitted, and this has also been done where the etymon is identical or almost identical with the definition. On rare occasions, the original sense of the etymon has been given when this has been thought to shed light on the entry.

For Turkish, the following works have been consulted: New Redhouse Turkish-English dictionary (Istanbul, 1968); J.W. Redhouse, A Turkish and English lexicon (new impression, Constantinople, 1921); H. Kahane et al., The lingua franca in the Levant: Turkish nautical terms of Italian and Greek origin (Urbana, 1958); and Julius Zenker, Türkisch-arabisch-persisches Handwörterbuch (Leipzig; 1866). New Redhouse spellings have been followed except in the case of the Constantinople h for kh, where h has been used to indicate the guttural which must have existed in the forms taken over by Egyptians. For Persian, reference has been made to Zenker and to F. Steingass, A comprehensive Persian-English dictionary (London, 1892), and Steingass' system of transliteration has been followed with the exception of rendering as m his ṃ which represents the Persian n when pronounced as m before b. For Greek, use has been made of Liddell and Scott and of Charis Patsis, Lexico ellēno-angliko (Athens, 1967); the Random House dictionary system of transliteration of Greek has been followed except for eta, xi, upsilon, chi and omega, which have been rendered as ê, ks, u, kh and ô respectively. For Italian, the Reynolds' and Cassell's dictionaries have been used; for Spanish, Cassell's; and for French, Harrap's.

5. Grammatical information

Grammatical information, in the form of part-of-speech labels and certain other indications of grammatical properties, is given between obliques. The following abbreviations are used:

absol	absolute	imper	imperative imperatival	pl n	plural form noun
adj	adjective, adjectival	imperf	imperfect	prep	preposition, prepositional art	article	indef	indefinite	pron	pronoun,

adv	adverb, adverbial	inst n	instance noun		pronominal
		interrog	interrogative	prop	proper
ava	active verbal adjective	interj	interjection	pva	passive verbal adjective
coll	collective	invar	invariable	rel	relative
conj	conjunction, conjunctinal	iva	inactive verbal adjective	sing	singular
constr	construct	masc	masculine	suff	suffix
correl	correlative	n	noun	unit n	unit noun
def	definite	neg	negative, negation	usu	usually demonst	demonstrative	num	numeral	v	verb
el	elative	part	particle	vi	intransitive verb
emph	emphatic	perf	perfect	vn	verbal noun
esp	especially	pers	person, personal	vt	transitive verb
fem	feminine	pl	plural	w	with
foll	following

The following points may be noticed:

- i) Singular nouns ending in a or ā in the transcription and in ā in the Arabic script are to be treated as feminine unless the definition specifically indicates otherwise (e.g., xaliifa). Other feminine nouns are labelled as such.
- ii) Where no plural is given, none is thought to exist. An asterisk in the grammatical information indicates the plural ending -iin (-yyiin if the singular ends with i). Efforts have been made to rank plurals in order of frequency of occurrence; where different forms seem to be equally common, the \/-aat* or -aat/-yya forms have been given first.
- iii) Verbs which retain the same sense whether or not there is a following preposition have been labelled /vt and vi/.
- iv) The bold dash is used within the body of an entry to introduce grammatical information applicable to what follows.

6. Special language indicators

Special language indicators, which are given in brackets, are used to point out restrictions peculiar to specific terms. Such restrictions may relate to subject areas and occupations, a particular connotation, a social group, or a limitation on currency. The following indicators are used:

7. Definitions and examples

Definitions are given in British English, but the Random House dictionary has been referred to consistently in an attempt to avoid anglicisms unintelligible or misleading to those familiar only with American English. Most of the definitions are translational, with some additional "ostensive" definitions provided by the illustrations. However, analytical definitions have recommended themselves as less cumbersome for many instance nouns and for intrinsically passive derived forms of verbs themselves intransitive; in addition, analytical definition has been preferred in respect of most function words, on the ground that their complexities of usage can be summed up more readily in this way than through translational renderings which would fairly consistently fail to cover the semantic ranges involved. Senses and sub-senses are numbered off. Wherever possible, verbs have been defined in isolation from prepositions with which they may normally occur and the examples then show prepositional usages.

Illustrative contextual examples are provided for all entries except those where the meaning is so restricted or specialized that such examples would merely smack of tedious pedantry. Such emphasis on examples is, of course, consistent with the usual lexicographical practice of citation and has the advantage of capturing some of the flavour of Egyptian life. As might be expected in formulaic areas of expression such as blessing, cursing, greeting and invitation, the gap between Egyptian Arabic and English is at its greatest, with resultant difficulties in finding renderings which convey adequately all the spontaneity and conviction of the original. The collection of idiomatic usages in general has been a priority and these are to be found listed among non-transparent items given after double bars in the entries.

8. Transcription

The system of phonetic transcription used here follows in most respects that adopted by T.F. Mitchell in An introduction to Egyptian colloquial Arabic (London, 1956, repr. 1978). The main departures from that system concern certain vocalic renderings: a distinction is made here between a front a and a back a, and anaptyxis is shown wherever it occurs (rather than simply within composite morphological forms). Stress is not marked except where it constitutes an exception according to the rules elaborated by Mitchell; nor is stress shown in quasi-literary patterns such as gaamiḡi. Thirty consonant symbols and six vowel symbols are used, the consonant symbols being listed here with their Arabic-script counterparts in the order of the Arabic alphabet, according to which the dictionary is arranged (subject to the modifications mentioned above in section 1).

i) Consonants

ʔ	ء	z	ز (also ذ)	ʃ/v	ف
b	ب	s	س (also ث)	q/ɕ	ق
t	ت (also ث)	f	ش	k	ك
θ	ث	ʕ	ص	l	ل
gʃ	ج	d	ض (also ظ)	m	م
ħ	ح	l	ط	n	ن
x	خ	ʒ	ظ (also ض)	h	ه
d	د (also ذ)	ʕ	ع	w	و
r	ر	ɣ	غ	y	ي

ii) Vowels

The six vowel symbols used are:

a (faṭḥa muraqqāqa) low/open and front

a (faṭḥa mufakkkhama) low/open and back

i (kasra khāliṣa) high/close and front

e (kasra mumāla) middle/half-close and front

u (ḍamma khāliṣa) high/close and back

o (ḍamma mumāla) middle/half-close and back

These vowel symbols are doubled to indicate length, the Arabic-script counterparts of the pairs aa/aa, ii/ee and uu/oo being ا, ي and و respectively.

Mastery of the exact phonetic value of each of the above symbols can of course be best achieved by practice with native speakers, but for descriptions of these values the user is referred to any of the grammars already mentioned. The following points, however, require special mention here:

i) q/q and ʔ

The ق of literary Arabic is associated with two distinct sounds in Egyptian Arabic. The first of these (symbolized by ɕ) is of more widespread occurrence and is similar to the glottal stop (ʔ). The second (symbolized by q) is similar to its counterpart in literary pronunciation and occurs commonly only in ʾammīyyat al-muthaqqafīn. One good reason for distinguishing between ʔ and q is that the former may elide while the latter never elides. Compare, for example, ʔilīl fi-sm-i (or fi-ʔism-i) (he made a mistake in my name) with ʔilīl fi-qism-i (he made a mistake in my share).

ii) Doubled consonants

Doubling of a consonant symbol in the transcription corresponds to the shadda of Arabic orthography. A doubled consonant is pronounced with twice the length of its single counterpart.

iii) a-a/aa-aa

The distinction made here is between the open vowel a made with the front of the tongue (rather like the English a in hat) and the open vowel a made with the back of the tongue (rather like the English vowel in the word calm) — cf. Egyptian Arabic barr (to pamper) with barr (to fulfil (a promise)). The long vowels aa and aa may be regarded as having double the duration of a and a respectively, e.g., nabat (to sprout) and nabaat (plant), ṭab (all right then!) and ṭaab (to recover).

iv) i-e/ii-ee

These two vowels are produced with the front of the tongue. The closer of them, i, is similar to the vowel in the English pin (e.g., silim), while for e the mouth is slightly more open and the vowel is roughly halfway between the vowels in English pin and pen; the vowel e occurs usually as a contraction of ee in a closed syllable (e.g., get-na). The long vowels ii and ee may be regarded as having double the duration of i and e respectively, e.g., ʕeef (bread) and ʕef-na (our bread), ʕiifa (livelihood) and ʕifa (evening prayer).

v) u-o/uu-oo

These two vowels are produced with the back of the tongue and the relation between them is analogous to the relation between i and e. The closer vowel, u, is similar to the vowel in English put, while for o the mouth is slightly more open; the vowel o occurs usually as a contracted form of oo in a closed syllable (e.g., yom-na). The long vowels uu and oo may be regarded as having double the duration of u and o respectively, e.g., door (round (in a game etc.)) and dor-na (our round), duur (go around!) and durr (pearls).

vi) Anaptyxis

Unstressed anaptyctic vowels are represented in small elevated form, while stressed anaptyctic vowels are given in the normal fount.

9. Hyphenation

The system of hyphenation employed in the transcribed Arabic is intended to serve as an aid and does not constitute an attempt to lay down orthographic rules. Its purpose is to indicate the main features of the morphological structure of composite forms and it is accordingly used with bound morphemes and monosyllabic particles, and in instances of elision, anaptyxis and linkage involving stress. Certain exceptions have been made, however, in order to prevent the amount of hyphenation from becoming excessive.

i) Bound morphemes: e.g., darab-ni, walad-i. Exceptions are: a) person markers used in the conjugation of the verb (e.g., katabt rather than katab-t, yiktib rather than yi-ktib), and b) suffixed pronominal morphemes when bound with prepositions or conjunctions (e.g., bikum, ḡaleek, ṡinnik, ṡikminnu). It may be noted that the third person singular masculine suffix after a vowel takes the form of incremental length with concomitant stress (e.g., ṡafuu they saw him, maḡaa with him).

ii) Prefixed and suffixed monosyllabic particles: the definite article (ṡil-beet), the time markers ḡa- and bi- (ḡa-yiktib), the conjunctions wi- and fa- (wi-qarab-ni), the negative particles ma- and -f (ma-katab-f), and the prepositions li-, bi-, ḡa- and mi- (li-beet-u). Exceptions: hyphenation is not used when a monosyllabic particle is followed by a definite article or by a pronominal suffix (hence ṡil-beet rather than ṡi-l-beet, and bikum etc. as above); nor is hyphenation used before the conjunctive quasi-suffix (as in saḡit ma, baḡd<sup>i</sup> ma), both because other form-classes may here be interpolated and because linkage here would imply erroneous stress.

iii) Elision, anaptyxis and linkage involving stress: an example of hyphenation in elision involving stress occurs in the initial composite form of the phrase huwwa-na lli ḡamalt-u; where an anaptyctic vowel is stressed, it is preceded by a hyphen and followed by a hyphen, but hyphenation is not used to isolate unstressed anaptyctic vowels; the term linkage here relates to the enclitic use, affecting stress, of such potential free-form units as lak and di, as in ṡil-leela-di (cf. ṡil-leela di) and katabu-ha-lna (cf. katabuu-ha lina).
